Diversity Column: Seeing is Serving

NACSW member Erin Woodson practices social work in a macro context as a grant writer & development director for a nonprofit organization based in southwest Akron, Ohio. She is also involved in community engagement locally. When teaching race & diversity to undergraduate students, she often connects her young students to documentaries, movies, or recording artists who represent the cultures they study together.

In this article, Erin shares how she engages with various forms of social media "as a teaching intervention" to learn more about and "serve more effectively the folks on the other side of your screen."

What It Means to Be a Christian Social Worker: A Student's Perspective

In her blog entry entitled "What It Means to Be a Christian Social Worker: A Student's Perspective," Anna Hagen suggests that being a Christian social worker involves seeking out the broken who are all too often forgotten and left behind, and reminding people to look up out of their despair and take in the light and beauty that is surrounding them.

In her work Anna strives to view each client as a unique child of God with gifts and strengths, worthy of dignity and respect, while she seeks to promote social justice, act in love and follow in the example Jesus set for us.
